The Importance of Friendships in Business Relations Between Russia and Europe

The business of business is business, said Milton Friedman once, implying that companies should primarily focus on profits. But business is more than just business and businesses create more than shareholder value. In particular, businesses are a meeting point where people from different origins, backgrounds, and walks of life meet and productively interact with each other. As such, businesses are also laboratories of people to people contacts and friendships, friendships that hopefully cannot only survive, but help overcoming divisions and prepare the ground for a different future.

In Search of Islands of Cooperation:
When and How to Start Rebuilding Broken Relations?

With first direct contacts at the highest levels between Russia and the US and hopes regarding a potential settlement of the conflict in and around Ukraine reaching an all-time high since the breakdown of the Istanbul talks, one key question for the future of the relations between Europe and Russia comes to the forefront: when and how to start rebuilding broken trust and broken relations, with the second part of the question, the "how", being probably more important than the "when". Will there be a big deal, a new vision, a grand design for a new Europe or will we rather need policies of incremental, small steps, creating small islands of cooperation ringfenced from setbacks and political turbulences?

12:30 The Art of Keeping Doors Open:
What Insights from Central Asia for the 21st Century?

Doors always had a special significance in the Eurasian region, as evidenced in impressive art works, such as Vereshchagin's "The Doors of Timur". But more recently, they have become the symbol for the efforts of an entire region, to resist being forced to choose sides and to keep doors open to all sides. What insights can be drawn from this experience for the 21st century?
