

Dentons publishes “Investing in renewable energy projects in Europe” guide

Dentons has produced the new edition of the “Investing in renewable energy projects in Europe” guide in cooperation with RECHARGE, the global source for renewable energy news and intelligence.

The latest edition of the guide “Investing in renewable energy projects in Europe” gives snapshots of the industry across 20 jurisdictions in Europe and CIS. In some jurisdictions, at least in respect of some technologies, the development of new projects has slowed or come to a halt—often by the curtailing of publicly funded financial support or other regulatory constraints. Elsewhere there is a strong development pipeline, and good projects have little difficulty in finding suitable finance, but for the longer term, there are questions about the system impact of high volumes of variable renewable generation and its implications for electricity market design, which are starting to be addressed systematically only now. Europe continues to benefit from trends like falling technology costs worldwide, but it must compete for attention and investment in an increasingly competitive and global sector.
